GETTING THE BIRD

JIMMY had an owl. Well, it wasn't a real owl but it sure was different. This one talked. Half the kids from the neighborhood were parked on his front porch waiting for the owl to put in an appearance. "Come on, Jimmy," Tony shouted, "roll out that famous bird you've been talking about and let's see it!"

The chubby boy perched on the rail looked at his friend. "Don't race your motor," he replied. "I can't hurry my uncle. Those inventors are funny that way. Besides, he hasn't got the owl talking all the way yet."

Before he could say anything further the door opened and a grease-stained figure with snowy white hair stepped out. "There it is!" The yell went up from a dozen throats, for in his hands was the famous talking bird. "Does it work?" "Lemme talk to it!" "Make it say something!"

The old man held up his hand for silence. "Easy does it, lads. I'm afraid I'm going to have to disappoint you. It talks, only it doesn't say anything." He gazed briefly over the puzzled faces, then went on. "You see, it's like this . . . all the old owl does is honk at me when I speak to it. Guess I'm going to have to work on it some more."

"Aw, gee!" Jimmy was the picture of sorrow. He took the owl tenderly in his hands and felt the creamy smoothness of the stuffed bird. It was unusually heavy due to the maze of tiny gears inside it that were supposed to make it speak. He looked at his uncle. "Can I take it to school . . . just this once, please?"

"Well," the answer was hesitating, "all right, I guess so, but be careful of it. Don't want any spies from the big toy companies finding out what I did or they'll swipe the idea right out from under my nose." Jimmy promised faithfully that he wouldn't let it out of his hands and the entire gang of them trooped off.

By the time they reached the school they were breathless from shouting and nearly resigned to failure when Jimmy let loose a loud "HELLO YOU!"

"Hello youuuu," the bird rumbled back, the sound coming from deep inside. Every face lit up. "It talks!" Jimmy cried. He tried again. "How's everything?"

"Hello youuuu," the owl groaned again. Then everyone tried saying something, but all they received in return was the same "Hello youuuu."

Jimmy and Tony dashed up the steps into the building. They still had five minutes before the bell, but they wanted to try it out in private. Once in the room they fired questions at the owl from left and right, but try as they might it came back each time with a stubborn "Hello youuuu."

"Golly, hide the owl, here comes Miss Barber!" At the mention of his teacher's name Jimmy almost froze in his tracks; then he jumped into startled action. Knowing full well that Miss Barber would confiscate the gadget if she caught them, he looked desperately for a place to hide it; then as her footsteps came nearer, he jammed it into the back of the cabinet radio, which was set up for the class to hear the morning symphonic hour.

Back in his seat with the class around him, Jimmy tried to hide a worried frown with his hand. All he could think of was what his uncle would say when he came home without the bird. Miss Barber's voice broke into his thoughts. "Quiet, class." She walked to the radio, checking the clock on the wall. "We will now hear the morning symphony, which I'm sure you'll all enjoy."

"Fooey," someone whispered, "this is the swing age." Nevertheless, the blaring strains of the sixty piece orchestra filled the room. The music rose higher and louder when a French horn let out a blast. Immediately another sound rolled out.

"Hello youuuu," it said!

Again and again the French horn sounded, and every time it was answered by the raucous voice of the owl hidden in the back. In spite of himself, Jimmy was about to burst from suppressed laughter. Tony was giggling his head off in the front row with the rest of the class hiding their guffaws behind their palms.

Miss Barber ran to the radio and fiddled with the dials, but try as she might she couldn't get this strange new sound to cease. Twice she turned the radio off thinking that it was the joke of a student, but then the sound disappeared too.

The whole class was laughing now, waiting for the French horn to sound off with its new echo. All the while the "hello youuuu" became louder and clearer. In desperation, Miss Barber snapped the switch off. "Uh-Oh," Jimmy thought. "Now I'll catch it for sure! She's bound to find out what happened!"

Maybe he could run up and snatch the owl out of there and make a dash for it. Then she'd think he went out of his head for a little while and not flunk him in school.

Then the principal came in! A second later he had the radio going and was rocked back on his heels by the voice that was cutting in on the air waves. He shook the machine and turned the dials, but it did no good. Jimmy buried his head in his arms and prepared for the worst.

"Jimmy Wilson!" The principal's voice was a command. The whole class was quiet now. Jimmy looked up and stuttered out an answer. "Aren't you the boy who monkeys with radios for a hobby?"

Jimmy nodded. It would be worse now, for they'd think that he had planned the whole thing. He shuddered at the licking he'd get at home.

Up front Tony was casting worried glances his way for fear he'd implicate him in the plot. Certainly Miss Barber's finding them alone in the room before class didn't help to divert suspicion from them in any way, and it was quite evident in her manner that she felt they were responsible for the whole thing. However, she couldn't see how it was done and was leaving it up to the principal.

But instead of a stern grimace the principal smiled. "Okay, Jimmy," he said, "you and your pal here" . . . he motioned toward Tony, "roll this radio out into the hall and see if you can fix it. Get rid of that racket and you can take the day off." Here the principal turned toward the class as the two boys pushed the radio out with obviously relieved faces, knowing that now they'd be able to get the owl out and hide it, and said, "See, it always pays to have a hobby! These boys will get the day off if they are smart enough!"

Jimmy and Tony simply grinned at each other!
